

A New Interactive Mapping Tool Showcases Chicago Region's Mobility Infrastructure Needs

February 2, 2015, 7am PST James Brasuell

A new interactive mapping tool, created by the Chicago Metropolitan Agency for Planning, makes the case for a renewed, regional focus on the infrastructure that moves the region.

According to an article by Rachel Dovey, "a picture is worth a thousand wonky words like 'infrastructure,' which — numerous sources have pointed out — isn't very sexy."

To make a visual appeal to the region's lawmakers and voters, the Chicago Metropolitan Agency for Planning (CMAP) created a new resource that turns "piles of regional statistics into clean-but-sharp interactive maps."

The site itself is organized across a seven-county region and offers three varieties of maps: roads, transit, and freight. The website also includes a "forward" that offers a policy agenda for CMAP.

Full Story: Chicago Planners Map "Crumbling Infrastructure" in Exquisite Detail

Published on Friday, January 30, 2015 in Next City

Related links:

- Making Infrastructure Sexy
- Mobility: engine of our regional economy